Description

Homes like this are getting harder to find. Built around 1880, this 3,440 square foot farmhouse sits on five open acres with Fox Creek running through the property, offering a setting that lends itself naturally to homesteading, gardening, or a quieter pace of life.

The land is mostly cleared and usable, giving you room to work, grow, or simply enjoy the space. The creek adds both character and function, creating a landscape that feels as practical as it is beautiful.

Inside, the home offers five bedrooms and two and a half baths, with a layout that reflects its age while still providing everyday comfort. Original features remain in place, including a striking staircase with an uncommon newel post and an original fireplace with a country Victorian pine mantel. Two substantial brick chimneys anchor the home and speak to its history.

There is ample closet space throughout, along with some recent flooring updates that blend well with the older elements. A tin roof adds durability and a traditional finish, while the upper balcony provides a place to step out and take in the surrounding acreage.

A partial basement offers additional space well suited for hobbies, storage, or canning. This is a home with presence... one that has stood for well over a century and still offers both function and opportunity for the next owner.
